I d only gone in just for a minute to speak to Hannah Rose--she s our laundress s mother, you know, and she takes in washing. And I had a message for her. I don t think--really I don t, Dr. Creyke, that I had left the basket for one minute when I heard it tearing off like. anything; and I rushed out as hard as I could and ran all the way to Thornmede without once stopping to take breath. I m sure I did all I could, but I couldn t overtake a horse that had bolted, now could I? Dr. Creyke listened to this eloquence with a strong suspicion that there was more behind it. There was something behind most of Hyldreda le Waldron s mischances and escapades. In this particular instance it was a clandestine correspondence, which Hannah Rose was aiding her to maintain. The pretended message was merely a cover to the fact that Miss le Waldron had had a letter in her pocket which she wished Hannah to post at a distant village. Moreover, she had been forbidden by her father himself to leave the pony carriage at all. She was accustomed to driving; as a rule she drove well, having a firm hand, and considerable experience; but Sir Hugh had reason enough for doubting her trustworthiness in other matters. It was not long before little Mabel began to recover something of her usual...
